PREFACE.

THE Country, in which the Marathi Language speaks its native language, may be described generally as being bounded on the North by the Satpura mountains, and by a line drawn from the Western termination of the Damans to the West from Damans to Goa by the sea, and from Goa to the East and East by a line drawn from Goa to the River of Chanda, and thence along that river to the Satpura mountains. That this region at some remote period constituted a distinct and independent kingdom seems sufficiently attested by the prevalence in it of a distinct and original language. But of its ancient history not the slightest remains remain, and no detailed description of it as it existed at the time of the first Muhammadan invasion in the sixth century, or subsequently, has been preserved by any Muhammadan author.*

In this extensive country the language is, I believe, everywhere the same, and merely distinguished in some particular parts by a slight difference in orthography and pronunciation. But though not divided into dialects, it yet presents three distinct styles which vary considerably from each other. The first, or Pracrit, is employed in books only, and abounds in Sanscrit words. The second is the language spoken by the educated natives, and particularly by such as are employed in any situation Civil or Military under Government. It admits less frequently of Sanscrit words, but * It is well known that in the present day, that this language, in consequence of the patronage which it has received from the Government, has become widely diffused; and that it is now spoken in the Courts of Nagpore, Guwahati, Poore, Baroda and Tanjore, and that it has become almost a necessary part of the education of the people in these places.

II.

adopts freely such as belong to Arabic, Persian, or Hindi. The third style is peculiar to the cultivators and lower classes; in this foreign words are introduced more sparingly and though it perhaps possesses few common terms unknown to the second style, yet there must be in it many colloquial and technical terms which scarcely ever occur in general intercourse with those who do not belong to the same class or trade.

Of these different styles the following work professes to be a dictionary of the second only. For had all the Sanscrit words, that are contained in Marat,ha poems, been inserted, it would have labored under the same defect which is attributable to the Dictionary already published by Mr. Carey---namely, that the words actually used by the Marat,has are so buried under Sanscrit ones that the student can never ascertain the precise word which he ought to use. The insertion, also, of such words has been now rendered unnecessary by the publication of Mr. Wilson's Sanscrit Dictionary, without the assistance of which no person will ever be able to attain the capability of reading Marat,ha works with satisfaction to himself. Nor, with regard to the third style, has my intercourse with the Marat,has been such as to enable me to ascertain the peculiarities by which it is distinguished. But if, as I suspect, these peculiarities consist merely in using particular words in the place of others employed in the second style, or in expressing the implements and operations of a particular occupation or trade, it will be obvious that, as the second style is generally understood, the omission of these words can be of no material detriment to the student.

The ground work of the present Dictionary rests on a translation of the Amarkosh made into Maratha by an intelligent Brahman, who also furnished me with a list of Marat,ha verbs; and on a careful collection of words made by myself myself in the course of perusing several Marat,ha works and various letters and petitions. This mode appeared to me to afford the best means of ascertaining the precise ideas which the Marat,has themselves attached to each word; while, on the contrary, by proposing English words and endeavouring to find equivalent terms for them in Marat,ha, it was impossible to determine how far the term given might express correctly the idea intended, or how far it might have been affected by the accessory ideas used in its explanation. But I have at the same time derived the greatest assistance from two manuscript Dictionaries, the one English and Marat,ha. and the other in Marat,ha and English, which Mr. Erskine did me the favor of placing at my disposal. The well known abilities and eminent qualifications of that gentleman, had his other pursuits permitted him to complete and prepare these works for publication, would have produced a Dictionary of this language distinguished by fulness and correctness to which the present one has no pretensions. I have, also, been much indebted to Captain Cocke, Interpreter to the Officer Commanding the Poonah Division of the Army, for the use of two manuscript vocabularies compiled for him by two different Munshis, the one in Marat,ha and Hindustani to which Captain Cocke had annexed the English, and the other in Hindustani and Marat,ha. These vocabularies were particularly valuable, as a Native must, from the similarity of all the vernacular dialects, understand the meaning of words contained in any other of them than his mother tongue more correctly than an European, to whom the objects and ideas represented by many terms being previously unknown can often be with difficulty rendered intelligible by explanation.

For the reason before mentioned Mr. Carey's Dictionary has been of little use to me, as not many of the words contained in

IV.

in it are used by the Marat, has in the second style, and as he has omitted to mark the gender of the nouns and the quality of the verbs. But I have derived great assistance from Dr. Ainslie's Hindustani Materia Medica,* Dr. Hunter's Hindustani Dictionary, Mr. Colebrooke's edition of the Amarkosh, and Mr. Wilson's Sanscrit Dictionary. The latter, in particular, has most materially facilitated the study of all the vernacular dialects of India.

On a comparison, however, with other languages, this Dictionary will appear extremely defective for it contains only about 8000 Marat,ha words. But it must be observed that the Marat,ha is merely a spoken language, and that it has never been cultivated or refined by authors either in prose or verse. Its formation took place amongst a people solely engaged in agriculture, and as all terms relating to science, law, and religion were adopted from another language, and as the vernacular tongue was not employed in composition, it will be obvious that under such circumstances a language could never become copious. The Marat,ha dialect, therefore, exhibits one stage of the progress by which it is probable that language has in some Countries attained to so great a perfection. For it is entirely material, every word being the representative of some sensible object or impression, and scarcely a single term being expressive of the operations of the mind. To think, to reflect, to fancy, and such ideas have no corresponding terms in Marat,ha, and to express them even inadequately, it is necessary to join the words in the mind to a verb having in its meaning some supposed resemblance to the act intended--Thus, to bring into the mind is employed to signify to reflect or to consider. That all improved languages labored at some time under the same poverty seems evident from the number of words now expressive

*I am not however aware what language it is that Dr. Ainslie intends to designate by the term Deccani, as scarcely a single word so distinguished is Marat,ha.

pressive of the operations of the mind which still can be traced to a sensible object or impression. But in most cases the primitive idea has become obscured or obliterated by a restriction of the term, and particularly by a slight change in the form of the word or by its composition with another.

In pure Marat,ha, however, there is not a single compound word* nor a single abstract term, and the primitive admits in common use of only one variation. In some few instances, indeed, it may be still more changed, and an abstract term formed, but this term is scarcely, if ever, used in conversation. When, therefore, it is considered that the primitives of even the most cultivated language are extremely few in number, and that its copiousness is derived solely from composition, or the alteration of the primitive according to some received principle in proportion as new appellations are required, it must rather excite surprise that Marat,ha should contain so many words, than that it should not be more copious. But the Marat,has, though possessing only a limited number of ideas, have been wonderfully ingenious in devising names for every shade of distinction comprised in the primitive idea. Thus every pot, pan, and dish of which there are perhaps fifty different kinds, has a distinct name according to its size, shape and the use to which it is applied---each article of dress and each ornament is equally distinguished---most of the degrees of consanguinity and affinity from the great-grand father to the great grandson have distinct appellations, and even a common switch has four or five names descriptive of its size and the tree from which it was cut. It is in this part of his work that the compiler of a Marat,ha Dictionary encounters an insuperable difficulty; for it is scarcely possible for him to understand clearly, particularly in verbs, the exact distinction which exists between words

* To this observation the greatest number of Marat,ha verbs would appear to be an exception, but these are not considered as compound words by the Marat,has themselves, and, in fact, their construction with other words in most cases deprives them of this character.

VI.

expressive of some modification of one and the same idea; and even if he has been fortunate enough to catch this distinction, the English language will not afford him the means of explaining it properly. It may at the same time be doubted whether an European will ever be inclined to pay so much attention to Marat,ha as to render himself familiar with these different names for what he considers to be one and the same object; but, as in these cases there is no general term, he will often find it difficult without such knowledge to make himself immediately understood. Practice, however, can alone enable him to ascertain and to appreciate such peculiarities in this language, and to supply the defects which occur in this part of the present work.

As in all languages that have not been fixed by writers of authority, the pronunciation and orthography of Marat,ha are subject to variation. The system, therefore, which has been adopted in the present Dictionary will not be found applicable to all parts of the Marat,ha country. It is, in consequence, necessary to remark that the only letters, as here used in which a difference will arise, are आ,ओ,ण,न,व,श,स, and ह. For the short a is sometimes used for the long a, न for ण, स for श or vice versa, and ह is often omitted. In words also beginning with इ and ओ, * a व is often prefixed, and in the latter case the long vowel is sometimes changed into a short. In any instance, therefore, when the word sought for in the dictionary is so written, it is only necessary to look for the short a under a long, ण for न, स for श or vice versa, to supply the ह when omitted, and to reject the व when prefixed to इ or ओ and the word will be immediately ascertained. In the middle of words, however, the व has been used in this Dictionary, though it is sometimes sometimes omitted in letters, petitions &c, and its place supplied by the requisite vowel marks, or occasionally by ॐ.

* I have even met with the व prefixed to words beginning with ह. उ

The Orthography of words is, also, affected by the two characters in which this language is written. One of these is named Balbad, the same as the Dewanagari, which for its accuracy may be compared to printing, as in it each letter is distinctly formed and the vowel marks are correctly written. For these reasons its use has been preferred in the following work. The other character is named Mor, or broken, as the letters have been evidently formed from the Balbad, and merely changed from a square into a rounder form so as to adapt them for connection and for quickness of writing. It is this character which is always used, except in Pracrit works, by the Marat,ha; but, besides its being subject to all the imperfections of common handwriting, it is scarcely possible to distinguish several of the letters from each other, or to ascertain the particular vowels except from a previous knowledge of the words in which they occur. It is therefore very ill adapted for fixing the orthography of this language, as the variations in spelling the same Marat,ha word, which are so frequently met with, may be justly ascribed not only to the inaccuracies inseparable from a handwriting that is common both to the educated and the uneducated, but also to the defects of the characters employed for this purpose.

In order that the student may be guided in the use of the words contained in this Dictionary, I have prefixed an s to such as are Sanscrit and occur principally in books, but rarely in common intercourse. These words, however, are inflected in exactly the same manner as Marat,ha ones. The Arabic and Persian terms, as they are often strangely disfigured in Marat,ha orthography, I have also exhibited in the Persian character. But it is to be particularly

VIII.

ly observed that no other meaning is to be given to these words than what is here annexed. All the words not thus distinguished are either pure Marat,ha, or adopted with less or more change from Sanscrit. Most of these are in common use, but a few may perhaps not be generally understood. In speaking this language, therefore, the class and situation of the person addressed ought to be considered. If he is a Cultivator, or one of the lower classes, pure Marat,ha ought to be used as much as possible with little or no intermixture of foreign words---if a Brahmin, Persian and Arabic words ought to be avoided---and in intercourse with all other persons the style will be sufficiently intelligible, provided that no unusual foreign words are introduced. Besides what has just been observed, there are some words which occur in books that are not Sanscrit though never otherwise used in Marat,ha; but these are so very few that I have not thought it necessary to distinguish them by any mark.

That the following work will be found defective I am perfectly aware. But in no instance can a first lexicographical attempt aspire to fullness or correctness, and most especially in a language which has been hitherto considered by the Natives themselves as merely adapted for domestic purposes, and quite unworthy to be employed in even the slightest literary composition. As, however, a great part of the country in which this language is spoken has been now annexed to the British Government, it may be presumed that any attempt, however imperfect, to facilitate its study will not be condemned. It is solely under this impression that this work is now offered to the public, and should it enable any gentleman to learn Marat,ha with more ease, or should it assist any person in preparing a more complete Dictionary, the labor of the present compiler will not have been bestowed in vain.

N. B. In writing Marat,ha words in the Roman Character, the system of orthography recommended by Sir William Jones has been adopted, with the exception that k is used for c, and sh for s accented. The Vowels and Diphthongs are, therefore, to be pronounced as in Italian, and the Consonants as in English, excepting g which is always to be pronounced hard, its soft sound being represented by j.

MARAT,HA DICTIONARY.

PART I.

MARAT,HA AND ENGLISH.

अ

अ The first Marat,ha letter, which is pronounced like a in sun, or more correctly perhaps with a sound intermediate between this v and a in hand. The pronunciation of this letter and the following one it's lengthened sound is accurately enough represented in the words attack, attach.

अ or अन before a vowel, a privative particle prefixed to words and equivalent to dis, un, less, without अंक n. m. A numeral; a spot; a mark.

अंकित a. c. Marked; spotted.

अंकुर n. m. A sprout; a plant; blood.

PART II.

ENGLISH AND MARATHI

PREFACE PART II.

IT may be necessary to remark that the plan adopted in the compilation of this Dictionary has been to exhibit, as far as in my power, such words only as are actually used by the Marat,ha. I have, therefore, in this part of the work carefully refrained from attempting to express ideas peculiar to the English in phrases which would either have been misunderstood or not comprehended by the Marat,ha themselves. Hence the reader will no doubt be surprised to find in it no such words as to acquit, to convict, to argue, to think, reason, temperance, fortitude, fidelity, with many others. But it appeared to me much better to allow the student to learn from practice the best mode of rendering such ideas intelligible to a Marat,ha, than to mislead him by composing terms and phrases inconsistent with the idiom of the language and with the thoughts and knowledge of the people.

As conciseness, also, seemed desirable I have not thought it necessary to insert all the synonymous, or nearly synonymous terms, which occur in English; and if therefore a word is not found in the place sought for, it will only be requisite to refer to one of its synonymes. The reader will, however, recollect that, as many an English word has a variety of meanings, no Marat,ha term, can possibly embrace the whole of these different meanings. I have, in consequence, always used the English word in its most common signification, and this idea the corresponding Marat,ha word, in general, expresses with sufficient accuracy, though in a few instances the consonancy will not be found so exact: ' have, likewise,

II

It is unnecessary to insert all the different words which may be formed from the primitive by the addition of कर्त्तृ or by constructing it with a verb. It is sufficient that the reader is sufficiently aware, that a substantive may be made to the primitive, an abstract or concrete noun may be formed, and that the doer of an action may be denoted by affixing अर, करी, गार— that the instrument may be denoted by affixing वंत, वान्, वार, मंत, मान; and that a cause may be commonly formed by constructing the word with a substantive or an adjective, with कारणे

At the same time, be observed that the two parts of the Dictionary are intended to be illustrative of each other. In the first part a greater attention has been paid to the Sanscrit words, as written, and in it therefore have been inserted the Sanscrit words, the names of Deities, &c. In the second part. In this, such words as are commonly used by the Marathas, in all instances, when an idiomatic phrase or expression has been employed to express some word or phrase in English but for which the Marathas have no term. For all, therefore, that respects the general structure of this language, or to the knowledge of the people the first part must be consulted. The second is intended solely for the purpose of illustrating the language with the colloquial and epistolary style.
